SHOWS NO REMORSE OVER KILLING HIS NEIGHBOR WITH GUN

Springtown Farmer Tells Officials "I'm Glad I Killed Him"

FOUGHT FOR 12 YEARS

Men Constantly Argued Over Water Course Between Properties

SPRINGTOWN, June 23.—"I'm glad I killed him," is the answer of Alex Legat, 55, to questions about him shooting his neighbor, Paul Kulscar, 60.

Legat yesterday was taken before District Attorney Arthur M. Eastburn, where he is said to have made a confession of the crime. Assistant District Attorney Edward G. Biester and Trooper Lawrence Prior were also present.

Legat showed no remorse after the slaying, and shouted: "I'm glad I killed him."

The two men had constantly argued over a stream which ran between their two properties. The argument had continued over 12 years; once it had been before the court. Both men have been before Justice Stever on numerous occasions and both have served time in the Bucks County Prison on assault and battery and malicious mischief charges growing out of the ownership of the water course.

At the office of Justice Stever, where Legat was charged with murder by Constable Maynard Barron, who together with Officer Joseph Belch, of the Hellertown borough police, captured the killer, Legat said: "I told him to get off my property many a time. I tell him I kill him a week ago if he no get off. Now I got him; I don't care if I do die. I fight no more with Kulscar. He was mean man. I hate him; but now I'm through fighting. I don't care what happens to me."

Legat, showing considerable anger as he spoke of his long-time enemy, calmed down to normal as he coolly described just how he killed his neighbor.

"I was working in hay field all day today. Me load four wagons of hay. I was tired out to beat the band, and when I come home I see Kulscar digging in the spring to change water course. I made up my mind to kill him if he ever do it again and I went into the house and got a shot gun (12-gauge) that belonged to my stepson, Joseph White, 17 years old.

"Then I walk out to near Kulscar and I let him have it. Kulscar fell down after he started to walk away. I knew I killed him. I don't care, I no more fight now. I don't care what they do with me. I guess I get killed too."

Two people, John Mattis, and Joseph Kulscar, 15, son of the murdered man, told police they saw the shooting which took place at 9.10, d. s. t., Thursday night.

The shot entered Kulscar's body on the right side and penetrated the liver and lung. His wife heard the shot and ran outside the house and saw her husband fall. She became frantic and called another neighbor, Steve Rago, who placed the wounded man in the rear of his automobile truck and started for the Quakertown Hospital. Rago stopped at the office of Justice of the Peace Stever and told him to call the police, that Kulscar had been shot.

After Legat fired the shot, he ran to a woods nearby, where he remained until 10.45. Then he walked back to the house with his shot gun, emptying the single-barreled weapon by knocking it against the wagon shed as he passed by. He walked inside the house, lighted an oil lamp and placed the gun in a corner.

Constable Maynard and Officer Belch were following Legat's return to the house from a point outside the dwelling. After Legat had entered the two officers, heavily armed, entered the house, where Legat greeted them by saying:

"I know you want me, I was coming down to see you anyway, if you had not come after me. He was on my property again. I warned him often that I'd kill him, now I'm through fighting."

PLANS PROTECTION AGAINST AIR MENACE

Great Britain To Attain Parity In the Air With Other European Powers

TO STRENGTHEN R. A. F.

Note:—This is the first of two articles dealing with Great Britain's bid for air parity, and tells of England's four-year plan for a general defense against air attacks.—I. N. S.)

By Pierre J. Huss
(I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)

LONDON, June 22.—(INS)—Confronted with a war-minded Europe and countryside clamor for security in the air, the British government has set itself to the task of attaining parity in the air with that of any power within striking distance of British shores.

Lining prospects for a Disarmament Convention and failing that a pious last hope for a Limitation Air Convention hold in abeyance the larger aspects of Britain's forward march to air equality, but in the meanwhile the air ministry's "brain trust" will be burning midnight oil plotting out the strategies of a secret defense plan whereby Britain will hope to repel any air invader.

Thus, while the R. A. F. is gradually being strengthened in all departments and even more extensively on paper through the application of a "Four Year Plan," the defense experts will be busy drafting the plan that will shield Britain with an invisible ring of iron and steel against any air menace.

Skeleton defense plans are already on hand, but the greater project has not been completed. It includes, among other intentions, the establishment of "pivotal points," from which powerful air squadrons will operate to cut off the enemy's retreat. Chief among the "pivotal points" will be the Scilly Isles, the Isle of Man, and a broad lone track on the Norfolk coast near the Wash.

The air forces operating from these striking spearheads will be self-contained, consisting chiefly of seaplanes. They serve a military purpose comparable to that of an outflanking column in land operations.

Each "pivotal point" will be equipped with its own liquid-fuel stores sufficient to feed its seaplanes over a protracted period. It will function under its own headquarters staff and have its own workshops.

The machines used will be powerful fighters capable of remaining aloft some 48 hours without refueling. A certain number of trawlers will be assigned to each of these strategic posts, each fitted with anti-aircraft guns and manned by auxiliary gunners specially trained in the use of these weapons.

Another large task presented by the general air defense plan is the provision for protection of civil population in case any enemy raiders break through the defense ring. Gas-proof shelters and bomb-proof stations, easily attainable in case of sudden danger, will be constructed and responsibility for their proper use will be placed on the shoulders of local authorities.

The average speed of fighting machines, it is expected, will be set at 250 miles per hour.

The final article will tell of the problems facing Great Britain in attaining its goal of air parity.

ENGLAND'S DOLE, SAYS KNICKERBOCKER, IS ONE OF THE CHIEF ECONOMIC CHARACTERISTICS THAT DIFFERENTIATE THAT COUNTRY FROM AMERICA

Britain Will Never Fully Recover So Long As She Has The Dole, is Belief of Many—Created Whole Class of Men Who Never Will Work Again.

(Note: Many believe the dole has brought unemployment permanently to Great Britain. H. R. Knickerbocker, International News Service staff correspondent, writes in the tenth article of his series on British recovery. England's dole, Knickerbocker says, is one of the chief economic characteristics that differentiate that country from America.)

By H. R. Knickerbocker

LONDON, June 23.—(INS)—Five men walk down Piccadilly in the gutter. Two in front, one in the middle, and two behind. They hold their arms down stiffly by their sides, and with heads bent, they sing.

Their heavy voices crash through the roar of traffic and passersby pause. A sixth man passes the hat.

Their song is a Welsh hymn. It is dolorous and its mournful cadences tell the other side of the bright story of British recovery. They are Welsh miners. They have not mined for many years. They may never mine again. They are "permanently unemployed."

The dole is to blame, Britain will never fully recover so long as she has the dole. It has caused unemployment. It has demoralized the working classes. It has ground down the whole population with an intolerable tax burden.

It has created a whole class of men who never will work again. It has prevented the migration of men from dying industries into new industries. It has presented this fair country with "derelict areas," pools of idleness where whole communities are rotting in despair.

This is what a minority in England thinks. It is not even a large minority. It is not powerful at home but it has powerful supporters abroad. It deserves to have a hearing.

Furthermore, the dole is a question that interests America as it must interest every country with a large unemployment.

The fact that England gives a dole is one of the chief economic characteristics that differentiate this country from America. The other chief characteristic is perhaps the fact that this country, a great creditor, imports more than it exports, whereas America, also a great creditor, continues to export more than it imports.

But any investigations that would throw light on the comparative methods of recovery in Britain and America must take full account of the dole.

First of all, what is the dole? It is a money payment to every unemployed manual worker in England from 16 to 65 years old, except farm laborers, domestic servants and a few railway, public utility and other employees.

How much do they get? The weekly rate in 1933 was for men over 21, $3.71; from 18 to 21, $3.12; 17 to 18, $2.00; 16 to 17, $1.37; it was for women over 21, $3.37; 18 to 21, $2.62; 17 to 18, $1.62; 16 to 17, $1.12.

For each adult dependent the family received $2.00 a week and for each child 50 cents a week. The actual average payment per claimant in 1933 was $4.25.

Can they live on that? John Evans, an unemployed mechanic gives the answer. Evans has had only four years' work out of the last eleven. He is married, has two children, one eight and the other eleven, and the four of them receive a total dole of $6.81 a week.

"We pay $2.75 for rent," explained Evans, "25 cents for gas, 25 cents for electricity, 27 cents for health insurance, 72 cents for coal and 25 cents for sundries such as soap, washing powder, polish, matches; and then 27 cents a week for my club."

"That leaves $2 a week for food for four of us. That works out at about 7 cents per head per day.

"This is how we spend our $2.00. We have 3 tins of milk—the cheap 6-cent stuff—half a pound of tea, five pounds of sugar, one and a half pounds of margarine—the very cheap kind—2 pounds of loose oatmeal, half a pound of cheapest lard, one pound of jam, half a pound of cheese and half a pound of pearl barley."

"But the main article of an unemployed man's diet is white bread. Seventy-five cents a week for bread. Bread, I hate the very word. The sight of bread makes me feel sick. Many a time my wife and I have looked at the bread and carried on without the meal."

If you want to vary it, you change from marmite to lard and when you're tired of that you go back to jam—if there's any left; but mostly the wife and I leave the jam to the kiddies and satisfy ourselves with the nice fruity label on the jar."

Nevertheless Mr. John Evans has managed to subsist on this for five out of eleven years. More than five million others have done the same for varying periods.

The average weekly number of claimants during 1933 was 2,100,000. They were not, of course, the same persons throughout the year. It is estimated that about 5,500,000 different persons received the dole during the year. The total payments were about $500,000,000.

Where does the money come from? It came originally from the unemployment insurance fund fed by contribution in equal parts from workers in employment, employers and the government. That was in 1913. The dole was then not a dole at all. It was legitimate insurance. Benefits were low, $1.70 a week and the fund financed itself.

During the war there was no unemployment. Everybody had a job, and the unemployment insurance fund grew massively. Two years of post-war depression wiped it out. In 1922 the fund began to borrow from the government. It owes the government today $550,000,000. During the last depression period 1929-1932 the government has paid more than one-half of the benefits.

At first only workers who had paid

FIND NEW PODERJAY LETTERS

Vienna, Austria, June 23.—New letters from Ivan Poderjay to his blonde French wife, Madam Suzanne Ferrand, were discovered today which definitely link the Yugoslavian with the disappearance of Miss Agnes Tufverson, New York lawyer whom he married last December, Vienna police believe. In one of the letters written before Miss Tufverson's disappearance, Poderjay said: "A miracle will happen soon, making us both rich." Miss Tufverson had drawn $25,000 from her New York banking account before her marriage to Poderjay who previously had wed Madam Ferrand in London. He continued an extensive correspondence with Madam Ferrand while in New York, about the love affair with Miss Tufverson and insisted he did not want to marry the American woman, whom he called an "old wagon," but Mrs. Ferrand, police said, wrote Poderjay: "You marry her and then if anything wonderful should happen, we have money." Police announced today they have concluded their examination of Poderjay and Mrs. Ferrand and have sufficient evidence to detain the pair while American authorities seek further information as a basis for indictment leading to their extradition.

JAPAN'S AMBITIONS

That Japan is not inclined to retrace any recent steps in its foreign policy is indicated by Prince Fumimaro Konoye, president of the Japanese house of peers, now on a visit in the United States.

In an interview in New York, the prince outlined some of Japan's present aims as he sees them. Although emphasizing that he was not attempting to speak officially but only as an individual Japanese citizen, his statement can be interpreted only as reflecting an official viewpoint.

Japan will not return to the League of Nations, he said, "until the league changes its views on the Far Eastern situation."

Defending Japan's action in Manchukuo, he justified this "not only on grounds of self-defense, but from the standpoint of what was necessary for the welfare of all the nations in the Far East."

Further purposes of Japan were outlined as including freedom for Japanese to live in any part of the world they choose, and unrestricted interchange of goods and commodities with all countries on the globe.

It is evident, from the prince's views, that Japan is due to occupy a prominent position in future discussions of peace and other international problems. Her aims, outside of her demand for naval parity, are of a kind to come into conflict with recognized policies of other powers.

"If world peace is to mean simply sticking to things as they are," the prince was quoted as saying, "then the Japanese people are not satisfied; they are looking for the establishment of international justice."

And it would seem that they want themselves to be the judge of what constitutes international justice.

In other words, Japan has formulated a definite program of expansion irrespective of the interests of other nations, and is determined to see it carried out.

Its course in China represents justice in the Japanese conception, but the world has another word for it. And it may be that Tokyo will find that it is much easier to formulate than to execute programs when these come into conflict with the interest of countries able to defend themselves.

England's Dole Differentiates That Country From America

their insurance premiums could receive benefits when they became unemployed and then only a stated time. Gradually as unemployment grew this principle was abandoned until today all the industrial unemployed who have paid a minimum of contributions receive benefits for an indefinite period. What had been insurance became in effect a dole.

Now what has been the effect of all this? Its beneficent effects will be set forth in the article to follow. At the moment the persons who emphasize the malign effects have the floor.

Chief among them is Sir Josiah Stamp, president of the London, Midland and Scottish Railway, director of the Bank of England, and a power in the land. A number of conservative economists are his allies. Chief foreign ally is Andre Siegfried, the brilliant Frenchman.

Their argument is about as follows: The dole constitutes a minimum wage. It is fixed so high that British costs are above those of the outside world. Higher costs prevent Britain from competing successfully for sales abroad. Reduction of British exports meant more unemployment. More unemployment meant higher taxes. Higher taxes meant higher costs. Higher costs meant still fewer sales to abroad. Result: a hard core of permanent unemployed.

They declare: First, during a period of falling wages, as soon as a certain level is reached, the workman under a dole system will prefer to remain idle rather than work for a wage that will amount to little more than he could get without working.

Second, during a period of falling prices when money wages too ought to fall, they will not fall, but will remain stationary, as they have remained in England. Because the dole immensely strengthened the trade unions who know their workmen if unemployed will be supported.

Third, the dole encourages employers to close down sooner than they otherwise would in dull times, since they know their employees will not starve.

Fourth, whereas in former times when an old industry died its workers were taken into new industries, they because of the dole the workers refuse to leave the neighborhood of their old employment and thus fail to be re-absorbed into expanding trades.

All these reasons they cite as prime cause of the fact that Britain has had more than 1,000,000 unemployed in good times and in bad times ever since the dole went into effective operation after the war. They declare this never happened in any country before. It could only be because of some economic element peculiar to Britain. The dole is that element. They blame the dole.

Finally, Sir Josiah quotes from a French economist a passage summarizing the whole philosophy of the attack on the dole:

"The price of human labor, like any other price, cannot be fixed in advance. Permanent unemployment can only be avoided by allowing wages to adapt themselves as freely as possible to the economic conditions prevailing.

"The most effective cure is exactly the reverse of the measures applied in England and Germany, but which by an extraordinary aberration are generally considered as a step in social progress. There is only one way to reduce to a minimum the sufferings caused by unemployment, and that is by giving complete freedom to wages. We believe that an improvement in the lot of the greatest number is worthy of every sacrifice, but we are convinced that the methods now being employed to attain this end are leading in exactly the opposite direction."

These are arguments familiar to the America of boom, depression and N. R. A. They are arguments of the British minority. Are they likely to be put into action? Will Britain give up her dole?

As Ann Haskel related the simple story of her flight Diane listened with increasing amazement and wonder. A confusion of thoughts—conjectures, doubts, questions—rushed pell-mell through her bewildered mind. ### HOME DRESS-MAKER HAS OPPORTUNITY TO CHOOSE PATTERN, ETC.

By Rhondena A. Armstrong

(Home Economics Representative)
The woman who makes her own dresses has the opportunity to select designs, materials, and colors to bring out her best points. Wisely, she will emphasize the becoming designs and colors and will discard those which are unsuitable.

When the home dressmaker has decided upon the type of dress she wishes to make, she should buy the pattern and material at the same time. The better modern patterns have lists of suitable materials on the envelopes. This means the design and material are harmonious in character. A pattern designed for soft silk which hangs in graceful folds, will not give the desired effect if made up in percale.

do well to select materials easily handled and simple patterns with good charts of directions. She should not try to take her own measurements. The scaleswomen at pattern counters are able to do this.

While it is possible to alter patterns, it is advisable to buy one as near as possible to one's own measurements. The majority of pattern companies use a standard list of measurements. Up to size 42, patterns are made with a difference of three inches between bust and hip measures. Beyond this size they are made with a difference of from 4 to 6 inches. For example, a size 38 pattern has a hip measure of 41 inches while a size 48 has a hip measure of 53 inches.

It is generally advisable to buy the pattern for the largest measurement, if the bust and hip measurements are out of proportion. For example, for a bust measure of 37 and hip of 41, a size 38 pattern should be purchased as this allows for a hip measure of 41. The blouse of the pattern is then altered to make it one inch smaller in the bust. Drawings showing how these alterations can be made are on the instruction sheet which accompanies the pattern. Special patterns are available for such unusual proportions as are found in the larger hip figure, the slender hip figure, and small figures. Few alterations are needed if correct sizes are selected.

a body, the cynosure of all eyes because they wore no hats. Much black taffeta was in evidence with hats made of the same material.

The Princess de Faucigny-Lucinge had a most charmingly simple sport ensemble from Chanel, consisting of a foldover black woolen skirt, the jacket of which was shaped like a blouse and closed by steel buttons. A smart little crisp bow of black with white dots finished off the suit.

ORGANDIE IS LITTLE WORN, BUT CHANEL IS MAKING USE OF IT

By Nadia de Beaud
(I. N. S. Fashion Correspondent)

PARIS—(INS)—Organdy is very little worn and seen this season, still such leaders of fashion as Chanel still dare to use it, just because it is lovely. At the regular Thursday evening gala dinner at the Ritz, I saw the Countess de Portes in a particularly effective black organdy gown. The decollete in front was square and V-shaped in the back, buttoning at the waistline. The wide skirt was made in the shape of petals, one over the other, giving a movement that was most effective as she walked. But the finishing touch was the little cape, also in black organdy, entirely formed of petals, reaching to the waistline. It was knotted in front. The effect was that of some dark and exotic flower, vaporous and very lovely, with a crispness such as has made this material such a favorite.

GROWING THE "FINES HERBES"

Omelettes and other dishes "aux fines herbes" are discovered on menus of many restaurants, especially those employing French chefs but the "fines herbes," better known as sweet herbs, are not so well known to the American household kitchen queen as they should be. The one in general use is the sage and next comes parsley.

Thyme possibly is third in the list of herbal acquaintances with tarragon as a vinear flavor, savory, both summer and winter sorts, basil and marjoram coming in order of lesser acquaintance. All are useful in well seasoned cookery. The term "sweet herbs" covers a wide field, some being used medicinally, others for scent, as well as for culinary purposes.

A little patch of herbs is a valuable garden and kitchen adjunct when one learn their uses. Summer savory is a common inmate of old German gardens, the fresh chopped leaves being cooked with string beans to give a pleasant flavor. Basil is much used as a flavoring in Italian dishes and is one of the pleasantest of these herbs for use in dressings and stews, being much less strong and equally as aromatic as the more popular thyme, a little of which goes a long way.

Marjoram is an English herb and is also useful in poultry dressings, soups and stews. Parsley is used more as a garnish than as a flavor. Some of these herbs are more flavorful in their dried state than when fresh. Parsley is one of these. Used fresh, the flavor is not so readily imparted. The dried leaves of celery give a stronger and more distinct celery flavor than do the cooked, fresh stalks.

A small patch of these herbs, some of which are annuals and others perennials, will give an ample supply for picking and drying for winter use and their flavor is much finer than those bought at the grocery which have been dried often for several seasons. A few plants of sage will give a supply of much better flavor than the ground products of commerce. It is an ornamental bush and might be placed in the flower border if no other place is convenient for it, the gray leaves and blue flowers giving an attractive effect.

STEAL LOAD OF SOAP

Philadelphia, June 23—After stealing a ten ton truck and trailer today, hired terrorists drove the vehicle at high speed through a guard rail of the bridge spanning the Tacony creek. As the huge truck, loaded with soap products crashed through the rail and plunged 50 feet to the creek bed, the hi-jackers leaped to safety. The vehicle was owned by the Miller Transportation Company of Philadelphia and New York. The truck was seized while its driver, Raymond McGrath of this city was eating breakfast. Police advanced the theory that the theft was the aftermath of the trucking strike here several months ago in which the employees of the Miller firm refused to join.

Barney Looks Ahead

By BURNLEY

SEVERAL weeks ago at Madison Square Garden Bowl in New York, Barney Ross, a slim, olive-skinned Jewish lad with burning black eyes, made ring history when he left-hooked the deadly-punching Jimmy McLarnin into defeat in a fifteen-round battle that has occasioned a great deal of controversy.

Ross, holder of the lightweight championship, became a double title-holder by virtue of this surprising victory, annexing the world's welterweight crown when the referee awarded him the verdict over McLarnin, after the two judges had disagreed.

After the bout Pop Foster, McLarnin's pilot, squawked long and loudly that his man had been robbed.

There were a lot of arguments as to the justice of the verdict that took the Irish puncher's welterweight diadem from him. Even the officials differed violently as to the winner, the referee and one judge giving the fight to Ross by a wide margin, while the other judge—the thoroughly capable veteran, Tom O'Rourke—scored but one round out of the fifteen for little Barney.

Most of the sports writers at the ringside thought the decision fair, but sports writers are not always the best judges of fights. On the other hand, such intelligent judges of boxing as Gene Tunney and Bernard Gimbel, among others, were of the opinion that McLarnin won decisively.

As I scored the fight, I had McLarnin in front by a clear margin, due to aggressiveness and harder punching. But I will say that Ross fought a very cagey and well-planned fight, catching the eve of the crowd with thirty-second rallies at the end of each round, while making the ring-rusty Irishman come to him all the rest of the time.

Anyway, the difference of opinion has started a clamor for a return battle, which will probably be staged in the fall. Meanwhile, another controversy has developed, as to whether Ross would be risking his welterweight laurels if he chose to defend his 135-pound crown against Klick or Canzoneri. Some say "yes," but the correct answer is "no." If Barney makes 135 pounds, his 147-pound honors are not at stake, according to accepted Queensberry tradition.

Anyway, little Ross is the first Jewish fighter to definitely explode the McLarnin jinx, and the first lightweight king ever to occupy the welterweight throne.

★ ★ At the very beginning of Nash Motors, C. W. Nash said, "I will never build a cheap motor car."

Today—after having built more than a million fine cars upholding that pledge of quality—C. W. Nash again says, "I will never build a cheap motor car." The Nash policy continues to be... Quality first, last and all the time!

And now, to celebrate the building of a million cars; and to reveal the new heights of quality in the 1934 Nash and its companion car, the new LaFayette—Nash dealers everywhere are spreading themselves to give a million demonstrations in 30 days!

A million revelations of Nash Twin Ignition power and the "jeweled movement" smoothness of LaFayette... A million demonstrations of superior comfort... of easy handling... of safe control... of results that verify the very latest in engineering and the best of workmanship.

We invite you to drive either a Nash or a LaFayette, or both.

MAXIE'S CAREER IN PICTURES ... No. 2 ... Fighting for Recognition

Publicity resulting from Baer's fight with Campbell brought offers from promoters to fight in the east, and Max responded. Fans were disappointed when he lost a ten-round decision to Ernie Schaaf, in New York City, upper left, but pleased when he stopped Tom Heeney, lower left, in three rounds. Then he tackled and was beaten by Tommy Loughran, right, in ten rounds.

Seeing possibilities in the young fighter that few others were able to see, Jack Dempsey, former champion, became interested in Max after the Loughran affair, and took him under his wing.

Dempsey's ideal always has been a speedy, sledge-hammer puncher, and he knew Baer could hit. He arranged a fight between Baer and Paulino Uzcudun at Reno, Nev., a scene of which is above, but Baer lost in twenty rounds. But despite this defeat, and the one administered Max by Risko at Cleveland, Dempsey continued to maintain his confidence in his protege.

Although he lost the fight, Baer won a wife, marrying the former Dorothy Dunbar in Reno a short time after the battle. The Baers, who were divorced last October, are pictured in a loving embrace.
